Brighton Bank's Internet Newsletter

June arrives with a kind of energy that pulls people outward. Front porches stay occupied a little longer, local parks fill up by early evening, and weekends quickly become calendars of farmers markets, neighborhood events, road trips, and familiar summer traditions. It's the season when communities feel most alive—not because of anything extravagant, but because people are simply out enjoying where they live.

There's something meaningful about that connection to place. The coffee shop where someone remembers your order, the local business you've visited for years, the annual events that quietly become part of your family's story—these are the things that turn a town into a community. They create familiarity, belonging, and the sense that even in a fast-moving world, there are still places that feel grounded.

As summer begins, June offers a reminder to slow down enough to appreciate the communities around us and the people who make them worth coming home to.

Why Fathers Matter More Than Ever:

Article by University of Maryland College of Education

Fatherhood often isn't defined by grand gestures, but by the quiet moments that shape a lifetime — showing up, listening, encouraging, and loving unconditionally. A recent article, “Why Dads Matter,” explores the powerful impact fathers and father figures have on the emotional well-being, confidence, and future success of children and families alike.

As we celebrate Father's Day this month, this heartfelt read serves as a meaningful reminder of the influence dads, grandfathers, mentors, coaches, and role models have in our communities every day. Whether you're a father yourself or reflecting on someone who helped guide your journey, this story is worth a few moments of your time.
